Guest Speaker

Dr Christine Cooper ~ 'Water Balance in Native Mammals'

John Sharp, President Gail McCulloch Guest Speaker Dr Christine Cooper and Colin McCulloch

Dr Christine Cooper completed her undergraduate degree and PhD in Zoology at the University of Western Australia and was a Postdoctoral Fellow in Zoology at the University of New England in 2004. She is currently a Senior Lecturer in the Department of Environment and Agriculture at Curtin University in Perth.

Dr Cooper's area of expertise is in vertebrate ecophysiology, with a particular emphasis on native Australian birds and mammals. Her research is a combination of both laboratory and field studies.

Dr Cooper is interested primarily in the thermal, energy and water balance of terrestrial vertebrate animals, and the influence of phylogeny, body mass, life history and environmental factors on these physiological traits.

Her specific research projects to date have focused on the metabolic, water and thermal physiology of birds and mammals.

She has particular experience in the capture, handling, husbandry and study of native Australian terrestrial vertebrates.

Water balance is as fundamental a requirement for mammals and birds as is energy balance, but far less is known about regulation of water balance, especially non-thermoregulatory ("insensible") evaporative water loss (EWL).

Water balance is particularly critical for mammals and birds inhabiting arid zones and areas undergoing habitat modification such as desertification and climate change.

This is significant for much of Australia's mammalian and avian fauna, since Australia is the driest inhabited continent and is experiencing rapid further desertification.

They have recently discovered that some mammals and birds can maintain "insensible" EWL constant under varying environmental conditions, a previously unappreciated capacity for potential regulation of this important variable.

Regulation of EWL may be an important mechanism for conservation of water by mammals and birds when exposed to dry air, promoting their acute survival in hot and dry environments. It may also play an important thermoregulatory role, simplifying metabolic adjustments under different evaporative environments.

Dr Cooper's talk introduced information that was new to most of those present but was very interesting as evident by the questions that followed.,
